

VAUDEVILLE STARS SHARE PROGRAMS WITH PRIZE STOCK AT CANADIAN EXHIBITIONS

Vancouver's 1921 Exhibition numbers the Prince of Wales among its exhibitors, for two rams and two ewes, yearlings, have been entered from his Pekisko, Alberta ranch. Though owned by royalty, these sheep stand on a democratic footing and must prove their superiority if they win a prize.

The District Exhibition, a Canadian cousin to the American County Fair, is the annual social event of Canada's rural communities. All over the provinces these friendly competitions are staged during the late summer. With the increase of wealth among Canadian farmers, there is a corresponding elevation to the tone of these Exhibitions. Crude pavilions give way to substantial buildings. Evening horse shows attract immense audiences and are social events.

Attendance at one of these Exhibitions will prove an eye-opener to any American who harbors an idea that Canadian farmers live amid frontier hardships. Vast pavilions crowded with pure bred stock—white faced Herefords and stocky Angus Shorthorn cattle, Karakul and Rambouillet sheep, massive Percheron and Clydesdale horses; other pavilions containing extensive displays of wheat and various grains, fruits and vegetables, prove that the northwest is a land of plenty. The acres upon acres of parked automobiles in which the farmers have come to the gala-fest are proof that the land of plenty has filled the farmers' pockets with wealth.

Excellent show bills are put on at these exhibitions and the visiting New Yorker will be surprised to find vaudeville teams familiar to Broadway, performing on a great open air stage for the entertainment of an audience of twenty or thirty thousand packed into a huge grandstand. Particularly fortunate will be the visitor who chooses an exhibition where the local Royal Canadian Mounted Police are on the program, for they furnish most spectacular displays of horsemanship.
